IMPARTIAL, NOT NEUTRAL.

SHANGHAI, SATURDAY, AUGUST 12, 1865.

THE mightiest engine hitherto brought to bear on the destinies of the human race is the printing press. Its influences pervade the world, and the most savage tribes are not altogether unaffected by its existence. When it was brought into being the exigencies of the period demanded it, for without it the inevitable principle of progress must have been broken through. Itself the monument of what had been achieved, it was however but the starting point of a fresh development of human talent and energy brought by its means from various quarters to decide the questions suggested by a rapidly advancing civilisation: Without it Europe would still be plunged in mediæval darkness, and science would still be under the undisputed sway of a few empiricists. Time, the greatest of innovators, rapidly showed men their wants, and during the ages subsequent to the discovery of printing, discoveries of more or less importance, and inventions of greater or less utility occupied the minds of the thinking portion of the world. Amid a host of discoveries brought to light, and of hidden forces of nature dragged from the recesses in which they had for so long lain concealed, the discovery of the power of steam stands boldly out as next in importance to the invention of printing. As mankind advanced intellectually and physically it was found that the old media of intercommunication were inadequate. Even when the laborious work of the copyist had been done away with for ever, and the thoughts of one mind were at the same moment placed before thousands of other intellects, something was yet wanted, some means of bringing the investigators of cognate subjects into immediate contact with one another. The requirements of commerce had also largely increased, rendering the tardy locomotion of olden times inadequate to its wants. Then steam effected a revolution, and steamers and railroads brought every part of the world into uninterrupted intercommunication. Thus far the progress of civilisation has been marked by the progress of science, the latter devoting all its energies to the elaboration of the former. The nations of the Western world discovered not only that the rapidity with which locomotion was performed aided the interchange of ideas, but that the steamer and railway were the supports of commerce, and the bulwarks of sound government. Against external or internal enemies the railroad affords the best protection, and thus while it enhances the wealth it secures the safety of the people. It might have been thought that human ingenuity could go no farther, and that Nature herself had set a limit to the further advance of science as applied to the arts of civilised life. But a new agent was destined yet to appear. It was not sufficient that the produce of different climes was rapidly interchanged, and the farthest extremities of the world united by vast commercial relations. The fluctuations of markets in one region were found so gravely to affect the interests of producers or consumers in other quarters, that the vastly enhanced rate of locomotion introduced by steam was found all too slow to meet the demands of the age. Then, after many attempts and many failures, the Electric Telegraph spread its branches over the globe, and having commenced from the West has now embraced the East within its tendrils. We have before us a general map of the lines of telegraph existing at the present moment between England and Australia. Superadded are the lines in course of construction, and those proposed by the Anglo-Australian and China Telegraph Company. Starting from the continent of Europe, which is interlaced by the telegraphic wires, we find in the first place a line stretching from Moscow to Kiachta, viâ Perm, Omsk, Tomsk and Irkutsk, and in the next a line running direct from London to Kurrachee, through Germany and the Danubian provinces, touching at Constantinople and pursuing its course through Turkey in Asia and Syria and finally skirting the shores of the Persian and Arabian Gulfs. From Kurrachee the line stretches to Lahore, thence to Delhi, Agra, Benares, Calcutta and Rangoon. The latter is the present terminus, but it is under consideration to extend the line to King Islands, Penang and Singapore, whence it would extend in one direction to Saigon, Hainan and Hongkong, and in another to Batavia. At the latter place it would join the existing Java line, and thence stretching to the northern extremity of Australia, cross the gulf of Carpentaria and unite with the line now working between Melbourne and Halifax Bay. In this plan so far there would appear to be no more than the ordinary difficulties which an undertaking of such magnitude must necessarily encounter. But the Company further suggest the construction of a line along the China coast from Hongkong viâ Amoy and Foochow to Shanghai. Here other elements come into play, more formidable by far than those merely natural obstacles which exist elsewhere. The prejudices of the Chinese government have to be overcome, and a whole nation civilised in order to prepare for the introduction of what to us appears a mere matter of course. We have lately seen the determined opposition which such a scheme even on the smallest scale is likely to meet. It is truly discouraging to find a nation deliberately opposing itself to an improvement of which the object cannot be understood except by those specially educated. But this we may rest assured of —that in the strife between ignorance and enlightenment, between the arts of civilisation and the prejudices of a semi-barbarous race the nobler element must win, and eventually prove itself superior to passive resistance as well as to active opposition. From the Chinese officials we have nothing to hope. Jealousy of foreign influence is so deeply engrained in their mental constitution that they dread the advance of western ideas, and only adopt them so far as advantage is likely to accrue directly to themselves. As for the idea of bringing themselves within the pale of civilisation, of taking their place in the great world-wide commonwealth, they scoff at the idea, and profess to be incredulous of the advantages promised them.

THE KAN-WANG'S SKETCH OF THE REBELLION.

If we glance back at events to the period when the insurrection first took place at Chin-t'ien, we have undoubted evidence of the display of divine power throughout the past few years. We find indications of it in the power given to the Tung and Hsi wangs as well as in other ways. When disturbances arose in consequence of the worshippers destroying some idols, the divine assistance then rendered was miraculous, and again ten of the brethren sufficed to defeat a number of villagers whom no one dared to interfere with hitherto and who had been rash enough to steal a buffalo belonging to some of the worshippers.

At Pupay and Luch'un the brethren mustered themselves together and set out for Chin-t'ien. The Tienwang being in Hua chow at the time and living in the house of Hoo-yi-kuang the whole of the volunteers united together, and proceeded to the above place to meet him and escort him to Chin-t'ien.

Here the royal birthday was celebrated and a new dynasty of the "Heavenly Kingdom of Great Peace" inaugurated.

After this, the Tienwang was conveyed to Ta-huang-kang where several victories were gained, and from thence to Siang-chow and finally to Wu-hsüan.

On the 1st day of the 8th intercalary moon the Tienwang entered Yung-an and there passed his new year. During the spring of 1852 Yung-an was evacuated and our troops then moved up to Hsin-hui. They encountered numerous difficulties on their route, but obtained several victories and succeeded in reaching Kuei-lin. After a fruitless siege here they moved on in the direction of Hooman, where they obtained a large supply of ponies and a considerable number of followers who joined them with great glee. Ch'uanchow was next taken, but this victory was obtained at the cost of the Nan-wang, Feng-yün-san, who received his death wound. Victory followed upon victory and place after place was taken with the same ease as a bamboo may be split.

The main body of the army was afterwards sent to attack Ch'ang-sha whilst Ch'in-jih-kang and Ch'ên-chêng-yung were sent to operate in the same neighbourhood. Just as the main body were victorious and on the point of entering the outward city, and just as the people in their panic were moving out of the city, the Hsiang wang was struck by a shot and went up to heaven. He had dressed himself in an extraordinary way on that day and was on the look-out when the accident happened.

The Tienwang and the Tungwang ordered up reserves at once and as good luck would have it no calamity happened.

By the use of a little strategy at Hosin and Kuachow the enemy were deluded into a snare and numbers of them drowned.

Under cover of this victory the siege of Ch'ang-sha was raised and the troops retired upon Yi-yang. Here an Imperialist general was killed and an enormous quantity of gunpowder obtained, which was formerly the property of Wusan-kuei. Our troops now crossed the Lake to Yochow and carried Wuch'ang, the capital of Hoopeh, by assault. As soon as this event had been duly celebrated troops were sent to take Huangchow. The place however was not held, the troops returning to Wuchang as soon as they had accomplished their work.

The news, however, of it's fall had reached Lu-chien-ying commander of the Kiangnan forces at Nanking, and he at once left at the head of his army and came up the valley as far as T'ien-chia-chên. A battle ensued at this place which resulted in the destruction and dispersion of 10,000 men; and Lu-chien-ying returned to Nanking alone and shut himself up in the city.

In the 2nd moon of Kuei-ch'ow (March 1853) the heavenly army arrived before Nanking. An entrance was gained through the Hêng gate which was blown up, and the place restored to order within a fortnight after this event. Detachments were sent off as soon as possible to take Chinkiang, Yangchow, Wuwei, Yan-t'ai and Nganking, and to retake possession of Hoopeh.

An army was sent up northwards but although the awe they inspired into the Imperialists gained for them many victories, nevertheless they had penetrated far into the interior; and in consequence of the troops at Peking being always on the look-out for them, and having moreover called out some good troops from the interior, the expedition resulted in ultimate disaster.

The Tung-wang's laws were so strict at this time that many victories were gained; still extended conquests were found to be next to impossible.

In 1854 and 1855 the Imperial Commissioner Ho met with severe defeats from our troops, and in 1856 Hoahgyung was defeated outside the East Gate.

During the seventh moon of this year (1856) the Tung-wang ascended to heaven and the Pei-wang also died.

In 1857 the Yi-wang left in order to carry on his conquests far away from the capital, and thus the government affairs were not in a good condition.

In 1858 Ch'ên-yü-ch'êng received the appointment of General of the front division; Li-shih-kien, General of the rear division; Li-chih-kien, General of the left division; Wei-chih-tsun, General of the right division; and Mêng-tê-en General of the centre division, with the general control of military affairs. The state had therefore some support, but the city was closely besieged by Chang-chia-eiang and Pukow was the only place open. Thus the capital had to depend for supplies from the North.

In 1859 I reached Nanking and, on account of my possessing a certain amount of intelligence, was promoted to the dignities already detailed.

Ch'ên-yü-ch'êng and Li-shu-ch'êng, both of whom were men of activity and determination, were made Princes at this time, the former under the title of Ying-wang and the latter under that of Chung-wang.

The Chung-wang applied to me three times to devise some way of getting out of the trouble that then beset us, and I replied to him, "No impression can be made in the present crisis, unless Hoochow and Hangchow are attacked. When the Imperialists find their rear threatened they (the beleaguering force) are sure to fall back on Hangchow and Hoochow in order to save those places, and in such case the army sent in that direction can return with all speed, and the rescue of the capital is a certainty."

It was agreed that the Ying-wang should make an attempt to rescue Nganking and that the Chung-wang should with his men assume the Imperialist dress and enter Hangchow and Hoochow by stealth.

The Chung-wang's men, however, being too anxious to steal ponies betrayed their motive and were unable to get into the city of Hangchow. The place was besieged and the walls undermined. Though Hoochow was not taken the beleaguering force round Nanking nevertheless retired.

It was not our object at this time to acquire new territory but to save the capital, and to this end the Shih-wang, who was sent on to Chekiang, was directed to return by a particular route.

The Ying-wang forced his way through Toukuan, the Shih-wang came by way of Yen-tsze Hill while the Chung-wang assaulted the Imperialist rear at Chüyung. The operations were so successfully carried out that on the 24th of the 3rd moon the siege was raised and the city once more free from danger.

The 1st day of the 4th month was set apart as a day for offering congratulations at Court on the great success which had been obtained. A council of war was also held for the discussion of plans for the coming campaign. The Ying-wang's idea was to make every effort to save Nganking. The Shih-wang proposed to carry on operations in the Fokien and Chekiang provinces. The Chung-wang's views alone agreed with mine, and the plan was as follows:—In the first place, the distance from Nanking to Shanghai and Szuchuen in the West, the Great Wall in the North, Tunnan, Huichow, Kuang-tung and Kiangsi in the South, is between 1,500 and 2,000 miles; whereas to Soochow, Hangchow and Shanghai in the East it is only about 300 miles, and thus there is a greater probability of success in this direction. As soon as the lower road is gained the next thing will be to purchase about 20 steamers and send them up the Yang-tsze River. At the same time let one body of troops penetrate Kiangsi from the South, let another enter Chan-huang from the North, and having formed a junction let them make a combined movement on Hoopeh. This will secure us both banks of the River and will afford us a good basis upon which to act in future.*

The Tienwang gave his consent to this and it is not improbable that it would have proved successful in the end.

Soochow and Hangchow were taken and the Ying-wang according to agreement entered Chanhuang. The Chungwang marched from Chi-an-fu to Hsing-kuo-chow but, in consequence of the rise of the water, was afraid to advance any further and withdrew with his force to Hsing-kuo. The Ying-wang felt great anxiety concerning the relief of Nganking, and he hastened in that direction at once. The whole plan to be carried out was thus frustrated.

Though Hangchow was obtained we suffered a severe loss in the fall of Nganking, as that was the key to the capital. The Chungwang, having acquired Soochow and Hangchow and put the two places in order, then rested upon his oars, manifesting no anxiety whatever about the state of Nganking. I felt constrained to write to him on his course of conduct and my letter was somewhat of the following tenor. "From ancient times it has been the custom in conquering an empire to effect the conquest of the North and West of it first and subsequently operate in the South and East; for to work from the North to the South (from above to below) is easy, whereas the reverse would be difficult and attended with obstacles." And again the occupation of the cities on the North and South banks of the River is the most important point and has proved hitherto the preservation of Nanking from danger. To relinquish these places at the present crisis for Soochow and Hangchow is to destroy all possibility of the nation being able to withstand for any great length of time. I can hardly suppose a man of your attainments can assert that the occupation of Soochow and Hangchow removes all source of danger. Such views as you hold are sure to give rise to discussion. Let me tell you that the great River may be likened to a snake, the head of which is formed by Hoopeh, the body by Nganking and the tail by Kiangnan. Hoopeh not being ours the moment Nganking is lost, the snake becomes divided in sunder, and although the tail may survive, it can after all enjoy but a transitory existence. Your opinions are such that I cannot concur in them."

The Chungwang in reply to the above wrote, "I am ready to acknowledge your lofty views and can only tell you that the perusal of your letter gave me great mental pain.

At the present time there is no chance of defeating the Imps. This lamentable fact is as bitter for contemplation as fruit plucked before its time is likely to prove bitter to the taste. There has been want of judgment, but such shall not occur again, &c."

* The Kanwang's plan will admit of two constructions. One, that he intended to operate from South to North, and the other, from North to South. The context a little further on is in favour of the latter sense.

H. B. M. CONSULAR COURT.

Before—C. A. WINCHESTER, Esq., H.B.M. Consul.

Sir E. HORNBY, N. LATIMER, Esq., S. BRUCELL, Esq., } Assessors.

Shanghai, August 10th, 1865.

GILFILLAN versus GLOVER & Co.

The plaint in this case was to the following effect:—That the plaintiff employed the defendants as his brokers to sell the steamer Chusan for the sum of $80,000, at Nagasaki. And the defendants received the vessel and were offered and could have obtained $80,000 for her. Yet they did not sell the steamer as they had undertaken to do, whereof the plaintiff has suffered great loss and been put to divers outlays and expenses for which he claims Tls. 28,000.

The defendants pleaded a general denial of the allegations in the plaint.

Previous to opening the case H.B.M. Consul remarked that when it was brought on for trial last year, Mr. E. J. Hogg was one of the Assessors. In consequence of his inability to attend on this occasion it became necessary to appoint a gentleman to act in his stead. Sir Edmund Hornby had consented at his request to act in that capacity, and he had also solicited the attendance of Mr. S. Brenell. It only remained for the parties concerned in the case to decide as to which person they would prefer to act as Assessor in the room of Mr. Hogg.

Mr. MYBURGH suggested that both Sir Edmund Hornby and Mr. Brenell should sit as Assessors.

Mr. EAMES agreed with Mr. Myburgh.

Mr. EAMES said that he had come into the case at a late date, as when it was tried before, Mr. Pollard had appeared on behalf of his client. He could therefore only take the minutes as he found them. From them he discovered that at the former trial of the case the question of dam ges was reserved. This, he would remark, has been a very common thoughnot universal practice in Shanghai.

Mr. MYBURGH said he recollected one case in which he was engaged when the question of damages was considered separately. On that occasion he objected to thus making two cases out of one.

Mr. EAMES said that the question of damages had been left out in this case, and he therefore knew nothing about it. From the minutes it did not appear that any objection had been made to reserve the question of damages, and when the plaintiff's case was concluded, it closed with the exception of that question. He thought it strange how it became understood that the defendants were to adduce additional testimony at this the adjourned meeting.

Mr. LAWRANCE said that when the case was tried Mr. Pollard was not in position to state the amount of damages, as he had not all the evidence bearing upon the case in his possession. Mr. Pollard was aware that he (Mr. L.) was going to apply for an adjournment.

Mr. MYBURGH said that as Mr. Eames was not prepared just then to settle the question of damages, and had laboured under some misapprehension, it would be unreasonable for him to insist upon the case being tried as he had contemplated. He would consent that the liability of the defendants should first be considered and then the question of damages.

Sir EDMUND HORNBY said that there were two questions to be decided—the question of fact and the question of law. The case for the plaintiff might be considered concluded, but the question of damages still remained.

Mr. MYBURGH said that the state of his health prevented him from doing his case justice, and hoped the Court would grant him indulgence on that account. The action now under consideration was commenced nearly a year ago, and did not in reality come under the jurisdiction of the Court at Shanghai, as all the circumstances which led to it occurred in Nagasaki. The plaintiff who had all his witnesses in Shanghai finding one of the defendants here, and regardless of the expense to which they would be put and the disadvantage under which they would labor, brought the action here. He thought the action thus taken by the plaintiff was harsh and vexatious, and that the case should by rights have been tried in Nagasaki. Mr. Lawrance made an objection at the time to the jurisdiction of the Court, which was over-ruled and which should have been noted, but was not. The contract for the sale of the steamer made between the plaintiff and the defendants was alleged to have been broken. The plaintiff relied upon a private letter written by Mr Glover to Mr. Maine stating that their firm had been offered $80,000 for the Chusan, but had refused it. This letter, as he (Mr M.) would show, was written under a mistaken impression as to facts. But he would assume for the sake of argument that the facts were true, and he would show that the defendants were not liable in law. The plaintiff had not shown that in refusing this offer of $80,000 which was the lowest limit at which the defendants were authorized to sell they had not acted bona-fide and for the interests of the plaintiff. The presumption in such cases as the present is strongly in favour of the agent. And he would submit as a point of law that unless bad faith be proved, an agent could not be held liable in damages Such a contract as that before the Court implied on the part of an agent reasonable skill and ordinary diligence; and while the plaintiff had failed to show that the defendants were wanting in either, the testimony adduced on the part of the defendants showed that they had carried out their duties and instructions with more than ordinary skill and perseverance. There was abundant proof that every exertion had been made, for, failing to sell the steamer to their customers, they had offered to divide commissions with two other merchants should they succeed in selling her. It should be borne in mind that in China and Japan the course of dealing in such matters is very different from that in European countries. From the evidence it appeared that in Japan steamers cannot be sold without considerable difficulty. It was evident that Mr. Gilfillan intended that his agents should endeavour to obtain a higher price than the price specified by him, and (Mr. M.) thought therefore that had the defendants sold the Chusan for the exact sum mentioned in their instructions, while at the same time there were reasonable grounds for hope that a better price could be obtained elsewhere, they would have displayed negligence not care. Subsequently Messrs. Glover & Co. were upbraided for not selling the vessel at a lower price There was another point which seemed very important. The limit made was a limit of $80,000, hard cash. Now, there was nothing to prove that the offer made to Messrs. Glover & Co. was for cash payment. In such cases credit was generally required, and frequently payment was made partly in produce. He thought he might fairly call attention to the usual course of dealing pursued by the Japanese. An offer of this kind was not considered by them binding until the contract was entered into and the bargain money paid over. The natives employed to buy steamers by the Japanese Princes have not the power to ratify an agreement. Satzuma, for instance, did it himself upon all occasions. He would submit that if it were decided that Messrs. Glover & Co. exercised due or ordinary diligence, and had not been guilty of malfeasance, the plaintiff was out of Court, and even if they had committed an error in judgment, they could not on that account be considered liable. But there was another important consideration. The letter from Mr. T. B. Glover to Mr. Maine was evidently written through a mistake made by his brother, a junior partner in the firm. In reality no such offer as stated in the letter had been made, and, inside official letter from the house written on the same day and sent by the same opportunity by the express desire of Mr. Glover, nothing was said about the offer. He thought it right to communicate a fact imparted to him by Mr. Gilfillan's agent. There was nothing inconsistent or dishonorable in this. The mistake arose in this manner. In conversing upon the subject with Mr. Duret, one of Messrs. Glover & Co.'s agents, Mr. Glover used the Japanese language as the medium of communication, and it was thus the mistake arose. Another question was, how far the firm were bound by a statement made by one partner in a private letter. He (Mr M.) submitted therefore that upon the evidence there would be no doubt as to the fact that a mistake was made, but assuming the statement made in this letter to be true there was nothing to show that the defendants acted in any way but bona fide, and did the best they could as agents, and there was not a proof in the evidence of any want of reasonable skill and reasonable diligence. (Mr. M. quoted Chitty on Contracts, page 6, to prove that the letter was rendered nugatory by the explanation of the circumstances under which the mistake arose.) There might be cases in which, in consequence of a mistake made by an agent, through a culpable negligence and carelessness, his principal suffered damage, but there was not a tittle of evidence to show that the plaintiff in this case had sustained any loss from such causes.

Mr. Lawrance said that after the observations made by his learned friend it would be unnecessary for him to speak. At this season of the year one speech was generally thought better than two.

Mr. Eames said that in this case the claim was based upon the culpable negligence of the defendants. With regard to the letter, if a person makes an admission the burden of proof rests upon him to contradict it. It was for the Court to decide whether the defendants should have made the statement they did without being sure of its accuracy. The plaintiff certainly intended that the defendants should get as much as possible for the vessel. They were, however, authorised to sell it for $80,000. The question of discretion advanced by his friend he considered correct as to general agents, but he held that when a simple agent is offered a sum up to the limit specified, he is bound to sell at that price. If Mr. Field's testimony was to be considered so particularly reliable as the defendants thought it, the code of morality on the coast of Japan must be different from that in vogue at home. Mr. Field was employed by the Japanese to buy the steamer, and by Messrs. Glover & Co. to sell it to the Japanese. The laws of agency are very clearly laid down, but the difficulty lies in their application. In this case, however, it was not difficult to apply them. He thought that the firm should be bound by the letter written by one partner. The defendants were guilty of negligence in sending the vessel away before the 22nd of January, as they were distinctly authorized to keep her until that time; in fact, they seemed to act according to their own pleasure throughout. Although it did not appear that the Japanese had refused to buy, but had merely not come forward, the steamer was sent away on the 19th of January, and previous to the 22nd they received a letter from Mr. Gilfillan authorising them to sell the vessel for $75,000. If they had kept her until the 22nd this letter would not have arrived too late. His view of the case was this, that Messrs. Glover & Co. must prove beyond a doubt that a mistake was made. They said that the Japanese agents have no power to settle in such matters, and again subsequently that they are not limited to a few thousand dollars. These statements seemed inconsistent. If it was true that the gentleman from Messrs. Glover & Co. did not speak French and that Mr. Duret did not speak English and that the conversation about the sale of the steamer was carried on through the means of signs and a few words of Japanese, all he could say was that it was a very unbusiness-like proceeding. It was a great pity that the system of symbols employed on the occasion had not been perpetuated. It is laid down that when an agent has misconducted himself, he must prove affirmatively that the loss entailed on his principals has not resulted from such act. The letter which was the basis of the plaintiff's case required explanation; there was something mysterious about it. He (Mr. E.) held that the defendants had been guilty of misconduct in not keeping their principals properly informed. Either Mr. Glover must have stated in his private letter what he knew to be untrue or concealed the truth in the official letter, nothing having been said in the letter about the offer. The question, then, was whether when a positive statement was thus made, the defendants were not liable for it. They seemed to go upon the principle of not letting the right hand know, what the left hand doeth.

Judgment was entered for the defendants with costs.

The following is a copy of that part of the letter from Mr. T. B. Glover to Mr. Maine, which bears upon the case.

My dear Maine,

I am sorry to say the Chinese remains here unsold. I have been waiting an answer from a Prince who offered us $80,000 for her. At this we were authorized to sell her, but I thought it was too little, and would not let her go for less than $85,000; so the man said that he would send the offer no more.

We would not have kept her had we not had a positive offer. I have promised to wait for three days, and if a purchaser does not come forward, we shall have her up sharp.

Yours &c.,
(Signed) Thomas B. Glover.

Municipal Reports.

Presented and Approved at the Monthly Meeting of the Council held Aug. 7th, 1865.

Finance, Rate, and Appeal Committee.

The Finance, Rate and Appeal Committee report that consequent on the new and revised Assessment upon Land and Houses having to be made, it has been impossible to have the Tax Papers sent out for those at the usual time. The Assessments are however now almost completed, and the Taxes for the quarter beginning 1st July, will be collected on the new Assessments. The Assessments are almost without exception at a much lower value than formerly, and it is to be presumed that the difficulty of former over-assessments having been thus met, these taxes will now be promptly paid.

Town Dues.—As H. E. the Taotai refused to sanction this measure, although passed by the Land Renters in Public Meeting assembled, the matter has been referred to Peking by the Representatives of the Treaty Powers. In the meantime the Wharfage dues will be collected as before authorized, but the absence of this Town Due must have a very prejudicial effect upon the Municipal Finances and prevent the carrying out of many very desirable measures of urgent necessity.

Wharfage Dues.—H. E. the Taotai refuses to make any further contribution than that he has paid for some years past, unless allowed to collect from Chinese residents in the Settlement, a collection your committee deem eminently undesirable.

Chinese Taxes.—To lessen the chances of malpractice in the collection of these, your Committee authorized the collections to be in future made in Dollars and Cash instead of as before in Taels and Candareens, and that the Assessment Paper shall contain on its face in Chinese and English the sum in Dollars and Cash to be so collected.

Local Post Office.—Postage Stamps have been issued and can be obtained at the Local Post Office. They have been availed of to a fair extent, but it remains with the Agents of Steamers to make this office pay. If on the arrival of Steamers, the Agents would use a rubber stamp Chinese letters to the Post Office instead of allowing their Compradores to distribute them, it would much assist in making the establishment self-supporting.

Mr. D. Campbell—was prosecuted by your Committee for having his house open for the Sale of Liquors without a license, and was duly convicted by H. B. M. Consul.

Boarding house Tax.—An objection has been raised to the onerous nature of this Tax, and your Committee have not forced the collection, pending further investigation.

Your Committee propose to draw up a complete statement of the Financial State of the Municipality as soon as the New Assessment Papers are completed. They will be circulated amongst the Members of Council together with a list of such Taxes as have not been paid, with the names of the Defaulters, and then your Committee will request your decision on the whole question.

Public Works Committee.

Gas.—Your Committee are glad to say that the Gas Company has shown great willingness to alter the draft contract in the points where it was considered one-sided, and an amended draft has been agreed on.

The Finance Committee, however, have not considered it desirable to ask permission from the Land Renters to sign this contract before ascertaining whether residents generally will consent to meet the greatly increased expense of lighting. A circular setting forth the expense to be incurred and showing the contributions that would be required to meet it, has met with very unfavorable responses, as shewn in the tabular statement hereto appended. It is now for the Municipal Council to decide what further steps, if any, are to be taken in the matter.*

Shanghai, 5th August, 1865.

Extension of Pekin Road.—Active steps have been taken to carry out this improvement as far as Pekien Road, and the line will be opened up thus far at an early date at very trifling expense.

Extension of the Bund line.—In front of Messrs. Siemssen & Co.'s new houses, this has been sanctioned to the extent of a few feet, to bring the line even with the wall of Messrs. Jardine, Matheson & Co.'s compound, as also to form a better entrance to Pekin Road. The improvement will be carried out at the expense of Messrs. Siemssen & Co. and others benefitted.

Dangerous Structures.—Several of these exist in various parts of the settlement, and the late very heavy rains have tended to increase the risk. Your Committee have called the attention of H.B.M. Consul to the most pressing case, that of some houses belonging to Mr. Kennedy in Hankow Road. One had fallen into the road, and an order has been obtained to remove the rest that threaten the lives of the passers-by.

Survey of Hong-que.—The plan of Major Jebb has been handed to your committee. It is not thoroughly finished off owing to Major Jebb leaving Shanghai. A liberal discount having been made for this the account is recommended for payment.

Watch Committee.

Your Committee report the strength of the Police Force at 105 men, 71 being Europeans and 34 Chinamen.

Your Committee again recommend a discussion with the Superintendent as to the best means of dealing with the securities of the Chinese police.

Your Committee beg to bring to the Council's notice the question as to private watchmen being brought under the control of the Superintendent of Police, so that a decision may be arrived at as to the terms on which such arrangements can be made, and also as to policemen doing duty at certain public places.—Post Office, &c.

Your Committee have to report a serious attempt on the part of certain public charitably-disposed to create a monopoly for carrying chairs in the settlement, which has been carried to such an extent that several cases have already been brought before the Mixed Court. The attempt is not yet put down and your Committee recommend that most vigorous measures be used by the Superintendent to bring all cases at once before the proper authorities. It is hoped that with the assistance of the Consulate no serious a disturbance will soon be put down.

Your Committee regret to report that a number of Foreigners fully armed prowl about the settlement at night, evidently prepared for the most desperate attack or resistance, and it is recommended that special attention be drawn to the names of men thus known on the list of unemployed and vagabond Foreigners which is monthly sent to the Consulates. It will be satisfactory to the Council to learn that a notorious Blacksmith's shop in the Maloo, the constant haunt of "Rowdies," has been broken up.

Letter relative to the sum of Taels 1,000, outstanding during the time Mr. Pickwoad filled the post of Secretary.

Shanghai, August 4th, 1865.

Dear Sir,—I observe in the published minutes of the last meeting of the Municipal Council, a notice that it had determined on retaining Tls. 1,000 due to Mr. Pickwoad, by way of covering a discrepancy in the Council's accounts during the time of his holding the post of Secretary. As this implies that Mr. Pickwoad has defaulted to that amount, I feel bound, as an intimate personal friend of that gentleman, to write and request that the affair may be put in its proper light before the public and the star which some may consider at present attaching to Mr. Pickwoad's name, removed.

From several conversations with Mr. Pickwood on the subject, I believe the discrepancy is accounted for as follows:—A Chinaman named Sankee was indebted to the Municipal Council in the sum of Tls. 1,000 on behalf of the Chinese Defence Committee, which was subsequently declared by him to have been paid to the then Treasurer. This gentleman denied receipt, but Sankee proving that a Bank order for the amount had been cashed, declined, as he said, to pay again, and the matter has remained in suspense ever since, the claim being unsettled between Sankee and the then Treasurer, whom alone the dispute concerns. Mr. Pickwood was, I believe and am fully borne out in saying, never even stated by Sankee to have received the money.

I trust that the Council will give this letter equal publicity with the notice of their determination.

I am, Sir,
Yours very truly,
Chaloner Alabaster.

A. Johnston, Esq.,
Clerk to the Municipal Council.

Mouhot's Travels in Indo-China.*

(Friend of India.)

This is an exceedingly interesting and valuable book, and will no doubt turn the attention of many naturalists to the hitherto little-known countries of Indo-China. Few men would have cared to undergo the long separation from wife and family, and to brave the hardships and dangers of all kinds, which the adventurous M. Mouhot thought well repaid by the occasional discovery of a new insect or a new shell. We often, indeed, meet with the most touching sentences recording longings for home; and a sad presentiment of his fate to die far away from friends and countrymen seems at times to have oppressed him. He landed in Bangkok on the 12th September 1858, and died of fever in the heart of Laos, without a single European near him, on the 10th of November following. The last entry he made in his journal (on the 29th September) was,—"Have pity on me, oh my God!" His faithful servants, Phrai and Dong, at once hastened to Bangkok and took all his collections and other property to M. D'Istria, the French Consul. M. Mouhot's manuscripts were sent to his widow, and his brother, M. C. Mouhot, has compiled the present work from his journal and letters.

The city of Bangkok, which M. Mouhot made his head quarters, is described as the Venice of the East. The only means of conveyance, whether for business or pleasure, is by water, and the impossibility of taking exercise either on foot or on horseback is detrimental to the health of the European residents. The population is roughly estimated at from three to four hundred thousand. The harbour of Bangkok is one of the finest in the world, not even excepting that of New York; and the beautiful river Menam fully deserves its name, which means "mother of rivers." The largest ships can safely coast close to its banks right into the middle of the city. The late King of Siam who was reigning when M. Mouhot visited Bangkok, was 47 years old when he ascended the throne in 1851. He spent the first part of his life in a monastery, where he applied himself vigorously to learning. He was well read in the history and geography of his own country, and had obtained a good knowledge of astronomy, natural philosophy and politics. He was familiar with all the dialects of Indo-China, with Sanscrit, and with English; and he used occasionally to write articles in the English journals at Hongkong. His Majesty had also a fair knowledge of Latin. In Siam, Cambodia and Laos there is always a second King, who keeps up a court but is really only the first subject of the King.

The first time that Siam was heard of in Europe was in the year 1504, when some intercourse took place between it and Portugal. In 1632 an English vessel touched at Ayuthia, and soon afterwards the Portuguese at Goa sent missionaries there. Soon, however, the Dutch obtained the ascendancy in the East, and established a factory at Ayuthia; Siam now became an important station for the Dutch commerce between China, Japan, Ceylon and Java. In 1685 Louis XIV. sent ambassadors to the Siamese Court at the solicitation of the King, and a force of 900 men was stationed at Bangkok under General de Fargues. He could not, however, maintain his position, and the French influence was destroyed for a century and a half. The ancient capital was Ayuthia, which won the same appellation enjoyed by Bangkok at present. The length of Siam is about 1200 miles and the breadth 400 miles; the country is divided into 41 provinces ruled by Governors, and the provinces are subdivided into districts, under the administration of inferior officers. Its native name is "Thai" or "Muang-Thai" which means "free" or "the country of the free;" the word "Siam" is Malay. The King receives a special confirmation of his authority from the Emperor of China, but only as a matter of form. The unfortunate ruler of the dependency of Cambodia, which is also claimed by Cochin-China, has to pay tribute to both his neighbours, as he is too weak to resist them. The river Menam is the life of this region and periodically overflows its banks. The Siamese commence their records five centuries before the Christian era; from pure fable we come to a mixture of truth and myths, and then to a tolerably accurate account of facts, as in the history of all nations. From the establishing of the capital at Ayuthia in 1350 A. D. down to 1851 there were 31 kings. This capital was conquered by the King of Pegu in 1556, and remained in subjection a few years; in 1767 the whole of Siam was conquered by Burmah and Ayuthia was destroyed. The first King who reigned at Bangkok was a man of Chinese origin called Pin Tat. In 1822 the English Government sent Mr. Crawfurd on a mission to Siam to form a commercial treaty, but he only succeeded in obtaining a promise from his Majesty that the export and import duties should not be increased. In 1826, however, a commercial treaty was made. Sir James Brooke, the English envoy at Bangkok, finding his advances badly received, abandoned the negotiation in 1850. Sir John Bowring succeeded in arranging a new commercial treaty in 1855. The King reserves to himself the right of prohibiting the exportation of rice, salt and fish in times of scarcity, and he has lately had occasion to exercise this right. Sir John Bowring was much liked at the court of Siam.

M. Mouhot in his first journey proceeded up the river Menam as far as Ayuthia, and thence to Mount Prabat where there is said to be an imprint of Buddha's foot. He then went to Chantaboun to the south-east of Bangkok, and on his way he visited the Kokram, or Kram island, in the Gulf of Siam, where he witnessed an eruption of a submarine volcano. His boat was going along in a smooth sea when he saw the water at a short distance suddenly begin to bubble up, and then an immense jet of water and steam was thrown into the air and lasted several minutes; there was a strong smell of sulphur for miles round this place. A considerable distance to the south-east of Chantaboun and on the coast of the Gulf of Siam is the town, or rather village, of Komput. This is the only port of Cambodia, but, unlike that of Bangkok, it contains in all only 300 houses and its trade is of no importance. M. Mouhot says that under a better system of government the commerce of Cambodia might be made valuable, and he adds,—"I will not probably be long before where it remains of this unfortunate land will fall under the dominion of some other power. Possibly France has her eyes fixed upon it." Not only possibly, but certainly; and the sooner she annexes the whole of Cambodia and Laos the better for those countries, though not for our interests in Burmah. The case is different with Siam. The present sovereign who was the second King in M. Mouhot's time, is an upright, liberal and able ruler, his people are prosperous, and the commerce of the country is rapidly increasing. The fear and suspicion felt towards France by the native kings is so great that M. Mouhot was suspected of being a person sent to reconnoitre the country by the French Government. Speaking of the first king of Cambodia M. Mouhot says,—"The very name of France is full of dread to these poor monarchs, and this present one lives in daily fear of seeing the French flag waving in the roads" of Komput.

Udong, the capital of Cambodia, is distant 135 miles north-east from Komput, and the entire population is about 12,000. The place is made lively by the number of chiefs who resort to it, or pass through it in their journeys, and by the Cambodian big-wigs who live there. The second King, who received M. Mouhot at this place, remarked that the Annamites had deprived the kingdom of many provinces. M. Mouhot replied that now was the time to retake them; while the French were smiling them on one side, he might assail them on the other; his Majesty, however, was probably too wise to contemplate such a thing. The palace of this potentate was furnished in the European style; and at a little dinner to which he invited our traveller, he had a fowl and duck cooked in the European fashion; the only English words he knew were "good morning." M. Mouhot was here agreeably surprised by hearing the French airs of the Marseillaise and Mourir pour la Patrie played by a musical snuff-box. About a mile from the capital is a rampart of earth intended for a defence against the invasion of the Annamites which is expected every year at the time of the floods. In the kingdom of Cambodia there is the same wretched law between debtor and creditor as there was among the Romans in the time of Appius Claudius, and it often leads to an Eastern repetition of Virginia's story, save that a Cambodian father is not very likely to kill his daughter, or the daughter herself, for the sake of her honour. The children of the debtor, moreover, can seldom obtain justice, as the creditor can generally afford to bribe the mandarin who tries his case, and of course this worthy does not reject the goods which the gods send him.

In his journey from Udong to Brelum, among the savage Stiens, M. Mouhot found that the war in Cochin China was the only thing which people could talk or think about. The reports of the taking of Saigon spread by the Chinese and Annamites, were very discreditable to the French and their barbarous Spanish allies. M. Mouhot stayed three months among the Stiens and came to the conclusion that they must be the original inhabitants, who have been driven into their present haunts by the invasions of the Tibetans who have overspread Siam, Cambodia and Laos. They are exceedingly rude in their ideas, and ignorant; they believe in a supreme being to whom they refer everything good and evil. When any one is suffering from illness they sacrifice a pig or an ox to this deity, but often a human being. They believe that animals have souls, and when they have killed one they hold a propitiatory ceremony. For an elephant this is conducted with great pomp, and lasts for seven days. They believe that white men only inhabit a few remote corners of the world, and they have got an idea from their experience of Roman Catholic missionaries that there are no such things as white women. The chief productions of Cambodia are tobacco, pepper, ginger, sugar, gamboge, coffee, silk and cotton. Of the last of which M. Mouhot says:—"England, that great nation for colonies, could soon make of Lower Cochin China and Cambodia a vast cotton plantation; and there is no doubt that, if she set about it in earnest, with her Australian, East and West Indian, and New Zealand possessions, she might soon secure to herself the monopoly, which America now has, of this precious article." In the island of Ko Sutin, in which the crown lands are let to cotton-planters, each lot gives a profit of 12,000 francs a year.

The most remarkable discovery made by M. Mouhot was that of the magnificent ruins of Ongcor Wat Ongcor, which is situated in the 14th degree of N. latitude and 104th longitude E. from Greenwich. It was once the capital of the great kingdom of Cambodia or Khmer, the only remaining tradition of which is that it had 20 kings who paid tribute to it, that it kept up an army of five or six millions, and that the buildings of the royal treasury stretched over 300 miles. One temple at this place is described as "a rival to that of Solomon" and "grander than anything left to us by Rome or Greece." All the monuments here are of Buddhist origin. Some of the bas-reliefs on the walls are perfect chefs d'œuvre. In the interior of the great temple are splendid galleries, a double row of square columns formed of single blocks supports the two roofs of the galleries; there are in all 16 stair-cases leading to these. M. Mouhot gives a detailed description of every part of the building, but the most interesting is the bas-reliefs, two of which represent the Hindu paradise and the Hindu infernal regions. In paradise the men are sitting on a grand dais surrounded by women, and holding flowers in their hands and children on their knees, and this is all. There is, however, plenty of variety in the punishments of the wicked. M. Mouhot discovered many other remarkable ruins in the provinces of Ongcor and Battumbong. In order to make out the inscriptions on them it would be necessary to have a knowledge of Sanscrit, Pali, and some of the modern languages of Hindustan and Indo-China. M. Mouhot believes that the age of some parts of Ongcor Thôm (Ongcor the Great) may be safely fixed at more than 2,000 years. The savages of the east of Cambodia call themselves "people of the high country," and they say that men of their own race live far beyond the range of mountains that crosses the country from north to south. There is a strong resemblance between the features of these people and of the figures in the bas-reliefs at Ongcor. They believe that the father of the human race was saved from a great inundation by shutting himself up in a large chest, and that in the beginning one grain of rice was a meal for a whole family.

In his last and fatal journey M. Mouhot penetrated into the far north of Laos to Luang Prabang. He describes the Laotians as more superstitious than the Siamese, attributing all misfortune to the agency of demons. They always keep a bit of wood whose form they imagine is like some part of the human body, and this, they think, keeps off the demon. They are not so cruel as, nor so hospitable, but they are more intelligent than the Siamese. In the north of Laos the only people who traffic are the Indians and Chinese. On his route M. Mouhot met with no Siamese; but Burmans, Karens and people of Western Laos. To this work are appended a Cambodian vocabulary for the use of future travellers, a list of all the new animals, shells and insects which M. Mouhot discovered, and his translations of Chinese tales. The illustrations are very numerous and good.

(Chinese & Japanese Repository.)

The Wei-tsang-tu-sheih is a work in four volumes upon the kingdom of Tibet. In it there is a series of maps. Fairly on Tibetan ground, our author begins to philosophise on his travels, and the first thing he tells us is, that the common people maintain the "yellow religion" (Shamanism), and that they reverentially believe in the Dalai Lama, a personage who has by successive migrations, again and again born into the world. Quietism is the principal doctrine of this creed; benevolence the principle by which the votaries are actuated, whilst they are absorbed in divine and deep contemplation. This benevolence is negative, something of the imperial compassion towards distant foreigners, and the love of the Dominicus friars. He has also prophetical gifts; but his greatest accomplishments consist in swallowing knives, and eating as well as emitting fire, two noble qualifications which we frequently meet with amongst jugglers; but, on account of these things, his disciples honour him greatly, and call him the living Buddha. From this subject, the writer enters upon the most favourite topic for a Chinese topographist, viz., the offering of tribute by the said Lama, which commenced prior to the accession of the Manchu family in China.

Under Shunchu, however, about two centuries ago, the fifth Lama, according to our Chinese informant, had an interview with the great emperor, and received a patent to be the monarch or general ruler of the Buddhist religion in the west. The Emperor of China, considering himself as the head of heathenism, thus thereby assumes a portentous title, of which the dragon is the emblem. Wars and bloodshed followed upon this peaceful settlement, in which some of the Mongol and Calmuck khans seem to have had a hand. Now it is a very remarkable circumstance that, notwithstanding the great reverence these people profess to have for the holy shrines, they cannot occasionally resist the temptation of helping themselves to the treasures which have been hoarded up there by the faithful. The gold collected there exists in such immense quantities, that the most expensive campaigns have richly been repaid by the plunder of Lassa, and hence this has always been the great point of attraction which drew these unruly tribes from their dreary deserts to the place of holiness. Of course they have always some pretence or other, in the finding of which they are as cunning as our best diplomatists.

* Apropos of this, it was subsequently resolved "That in view of the discouraging answers returned by residents to the proposition for assuming a lighting rate, the Municipal Council do continue the present system of Oil Lamps until such time as the state of the Finances will permit them to recommend the lighting of the public streets by Gas."

In general, however, these expeditions arise from pious motives, such as, for instance, a pilgrimage to some temple or other, and then it unfortunately happens that the devotees are so ravished with the glittering metal, of which they unfortunately have seen very little in Tartary, that they cannot avoid possessing themselves of the yellow dust. At other times some quarrel amongst the Lamas calls forward their interposition, and they appear on the plateau of Tibet as pacificators, who merely for the sake of establishing peace, wage war. Let the cause, however, be what it may, they never forget helping themselves to the good things that are found in abundance in holy shrines and niches, and having accomplished their object, they disappear as fast as they come. In one of their pious crusades they were so much charmed with the whole system of hierarchy, that they, in a fit of fervent devotion, packed the very Lama upon their horses and camels, and the camped with their precious burden to Kuhi. Their local knowledge is perfect, because the principal Lamas of their own nation study at Lassa and the environs, and are also there invested with authority to sway the nomads. Towards the end of the last century an enemy, no other than the hardy Ghorkas, appeared in the south, and, availing themselves of the absence of the Teshoo Lama, who was then at Peking, pounced upon the temples, and made a clear sweep of all the invaluables. For this outrage, however, the Chinese made them pay dearly and they remember the lesson to this very day.

Though the Lamas detest the Chinese as an unclean race, yet they have always found it for their advantage to claim the protection of the great emperor. This has also been freely granted, and it was owing to Chinese influence that the power of the secular rulers was put down, and the Lama made the supreme authority of the land. Still there was one condition to which this chief had to subscribe, viz., that his migration should only take place according to the sanction of the court; and, moreover, the transmigration having taken place in obedience to the imperial edict, the Chinese resident should always be consulted, and everything should be done by his direction. This is then a very proper way of managing matters. Whilst the Chinese Emperor has all the credit of granting his paternal protection, it is a very cheap mode of doing things; 2,000 soldiers are sufficient to keep the whole country in order, and the whole annual expenditure does not exceed 100,000 Taels.

What strikes us most in this account is the gorgeous description of the temples in and near Lassa. As, however, other writers have amply dwelt upon this subject, we must for this time skip it over. The grand principle that pervades all Tibet is to live in poverty and wretchedness, in order to save money for building temples and endowing monasteries. Hence all the national treasure is locked up in these shades of laziness and vice. After pursuing the route towards the south, where our author regales his reader with many hard names, he finally arrives on the frontiers of Nipal, the inhabitants of which he honours with the honourable name of thievish Ghorkas. He very wisely remarks at the end, that, under the bright heaven and the changes of the sun, there are other wonderful things and extraordinary phenomena, but the roads through mountains and canals being not yet made, the country remains a vast wilderness.

The first race are the barbarians who live in the neighbourhood of Tut-sien-lou. They dress magnificently in furs and silks, wear pomards, and are, moreover, enterprising. Trade cannot be carried on by anybody, except under the express sanction of a set of women. Addicted to Shamanism, they do not bury their bodies, but expose them to the kites, thus performing, after their death, the most virtuous action, by feeding with their own substance the brute creation. This, indeed, is charity with a vengeance.

Next to these are the Letung tribe, a very orderly set, engaged in spinning and weaving, and, moreover, an inoffensive race. The Petang very much resemble the former. Our author does not inform us of their numbers, nor tell us whether they have a different language, and an alphabet of their own. In describing the Setsang tribe, he principally expatiates upon the marriage ceremonies, without giving any idea of the character of the people. If one of the Lamas commits adultery, he is sewn up with the offending party in a skin, and exposed in the desert.

Of the Aleko we learn nothing else, but that men as well as women wear a very curious head-dress.

We leave out several tribes, because what is said about them is scarcely worth our notice, and merely advert to the Loqukenpu, who live to the south of Tibet. They are a set of savages, who besmear their body with all possible colours, are ignorant of the Buddhist religion, and live in holes, during the winter they dress in skins, and in the summer they make use of leaves for the same purpose. The Tibetans send the most desperate of their criminals amongst them, and they are sure of never seeing them return.

The Palihpoo are, on the contrary, far more civilised, excel in many arts, also engage in trade, but have one radical vice, that of resisting the authority of the celestial empire. Some fifty years ago they sent a tribute-bearer to the Chinese resident at Lassa. He received the envoy very graciously, and bestowed upon the said barbarians commercial privileges. They commenced trading, but, alas! their hankering after gain, a distinctive trait in the barbarian character, and nowhere more conspicuous than amongst red-bristled tribes, involved them in trouble; edicts were issued, which they would-not obey, and their stubbornness obliged the celestial officers to march forward with an army in order to destroy this unruly set. With what success the said general met we are not told, but are led to believe that the issue very much resembled that of all other Chinese campaigns, and that the refractory brood was exterminated without mercy.

The nearer Toofan tribes being a very warlike set of people, it was deemed expedient to form alliances with them, and these proving futile, the brave Chinese generals had to subdue them. Soon after this it was found expedient to extend the sway further into Tibet, and this being obtained, it remains to be seen whether or not, sooner or later, Chinese influence will be felt in Bokhara as well as Afghanistan.

The subject of tribute is treated with considerable accuracy. It does the heart of a Chinese good to enter minutely into a list of gifts, which are humbly offered at the foot of the throne of the great emperor, in token of homage and fealty. Amongst the articles sent by the Tibetan Dalai Lama are gilded brass images of Buddha, beads, rhinoceros' horns, flowered carpets, woollens, &c.

Our author next dwells upon the calendar of the country, which does not differ much from the Chinese. The year commences in spring, and is called accordingly to a certain animal, as the rat or the mouse. The celebration of the new year is accompanied with equally noisy ceremonies as in China. The youth wear garlands and crowns, and show themselves about in the city, whilst others dance to the sound of drums, and perform a mock fight with battle-axes.

The Tibetan army is required to consist of 61,000 men, both horse and foot; the former buy their animals from the Tartars, or the Mongols themselves enlist in the cavalry. They wear a cuirass and helmet, which red tassels and peacock's feathers, and are armed with a sword, carbine, and large spear. Thus superbly mounted and splendidly accoutred, they inspire terror as much as the celestial cavalry, of which the benevolent reader may occasionally see a few traversing the streets of Macao.

The description of the war-horse by Virgil is too faint when applied to these coursers, and the fierceness of the animal is such, that some man must go before it to lead it on, in order to prevent the rider from tumbling off. Thus it happens that no spurs are used, and that the stirrups are made after the model of the ancients, and described by the greatest sinologue as the metal by which a person mounts a "horse," perform all the service. The infantry stick in their caps the feathers of cocks; every soldier carries two swords, bow and arrows, and sometimes only a spear of considerable length. The whole army is reviewed during the second and third months of the year.

Of the penal laws we have the following account:—

> They are very tyrannical. As soon as a criminal is seized, no matter what was his delinquency, he is bound hand and foot, and thrust into a dark room, until he be cited before the judge.
> The body of a person who is killed in quarrel is thrown into the water.
> He who kills anybody must pay a fine into the public treasury, and there must be prayer said for the murdered person.
> Whosoever has neither oxen nor sheep, nor money to buy himself free, is bound and thrown into the water.
> Those who, while fighting, kill, shall all, without making any difference between the principal or the abettor, be condemned to death, or be tied to a pillar, and have arrows, as well as matchlocks, discharged at them.
> Those who die in consequence of hard drinking shall have their heads cut off from the corpse, to be publicly exposed, or sent to the Lhya tribe to be eaten by them. This race seems to be endowed with a peculiar appetite, and the Tibetans are in the habit of transporting their convicts into their territory, to supply the said savages with a meal.
> A criminal may also be bound and thrown into a pit of scorpions, to be stung to death. The family of the robber is to be imprisoned, and to pay the double of the stolen goods, whilst the robber has to lose his eyes, and to have his nose, hands, or feet cut off. Those who have committed great crimes are to be beaten with things, and then put into water. After some time they are again beaten, and thus thrice. If they still deny their guilt, their chest is then bespringkled with boiling oil, whilst the flesh is cut open with a small pendard, and they have then again to endure the ordeal of water. If no confession after all this can be extorted, and there exist no proofs, they are set at liberty. The bodies of those who die after death are thrown into water. Ordinary cases, such as quarrels and adultery, are punishable by fines.

The author remarks that he has never heard of more cruel tortures, and certainly some, if true, are execrable.

The taxes are levied upon all articles of natural produce, from the shaggy goat to the iron that is dug from the bowels of the earth. Moreover, the conscription, according to which every male from 20 to 60 years is obliged to serve the state, furnishes a good revenue, for many of the inhabitants prefer paying 50 cash per day to be exempted from the service, whenever it is their turn. Otherwise the whole population is put under contribution by the convents.

In giving an account of the dress of the nation, the author is very prolix, so as to draw up a complete vade mecum for a tailor. The climate requires warm clothing, hence the Tibetans are very expert in manufacturing woollens, and, like the Chinese, put one dress over the other to keep themselves warm. With the poorer classes sheep-skins are used for the same purpose, whilst the men of distinction wear costly furs and silks. The head-dress has a very grotesque appearance, and the locks worn by them have soles of immense thickness, to prevent the wearer from catching cold, and being tortured by rheumatism. Their daily food is barley and mutton, the latter often eaten raw, and kept ready in ice for daily consumption. All classes indulge in tea, which is, however, seasoned with salt and oil. Of their barley a variety of liquors are made, of which they partake freely. Their means of subsistence being very scanty, they are often reduced to the greatest straits, and hunger and misery, joined to the small-pox, desolate towns and villages.

To keep the population down, on the Malthusian plan, polyandry has been introduced, but the Chinese are so shocked with this preposterous custom, that they have actually in several districts put a stop to it. A country that brings forth the almond and grape, might likely be made to produce more nutritious food than mere barley; still national prejudices are in favour of this article, and, therefore, it is cultivated almost exclusively.

The marriage ceremonies, which are minutely detailed by the writer, contain nothing extraordinary. The alliances are concluded with the perfect assent of the parents of both parties. The women are mere drudges, and neither beauty nor sweetness of temper are considered accomplishments; the only thing required is, that they shall possess the requisite qualifications for working hard.

As soon as a person is dead, the body is bound with a number of ropes, and the Lama come repeatedly to say mass. A few days having thus elapsed, it is cut to pieces and given to the dogs, whilst the bones, pounded in a mortar to dust, are burnt, and then kneaded together like dough. Some persons prefer to give the deceased to the kites. We know of nothing so disgusting and revolting to nature; still it is the general custom of the country. The deceased Lamas, however, are burnt, and the ashes deposited in urns, which are carefully put into hollow images to serve as objects of worship.

Their dwellings are poor hovels, made of stones, put rudely one upon another, without flooring, and always built on the sunny side of hills, so as to be sheltered against the fearful northern blasts. Many live in caverns, with far greater security. On account of the dryness of the soil, such quantities of sand are raised by tornadoes as to cover whole districts, and hence the precaution of the natives to protect themselves against this evil.

In the medical art they are, according to our author, well advanced, but they rely much upon spells and incantations in their cures. They are very well practised in the art of divination and sorcery, and their women use all kinds of magical arts to portend future events.

The accounts of the trade are exceedingly meagre. Women appear to be the principal merchants, the men being too sluggish to engage in any laborious pursuits. The artizans of Tibet possess skill in working metals, and their manufactures are by no means contemptible.

Having thus safely reached the end of this review, we ought to add something not generally known. The Moravians, who have furnished missionaries to the most dismal region of the world, also wished to enlighten the poor Tibetans with the gospel; the more so, as they generally believed that no other Christian denomination would ever take the trouble of making that remote country the field of its exertions. In this conjecture, however, they were wrong, for the Church Missionary Society sent, at an early date, a German to the frontiers to acquire the language, and to commence an intercourse with the natives. He had compiled a small dictionary, when he was snatched away by death, but his posthumous work was published at Serampore. In the meanwhile, a few indefatigable Moravians joined themselves to some Calmuck hordes in southern Russia, and, under much suffering and persecution, gained the love of the people, and obtained firm hold upon their minds. With these nomads, they wished to pass on to others further to the east in their annual wanderings; and since the free hordes in Bokhara frequently go to Tibet on a pilgrimage, they thus hoped to enter, with their purishioners, the country. It is very remarkable that, in the very year when this plan was to be put into execution, the Russian government forced them to leave their nomadic congregation, and to abandon for ever the work of missions amongst the erratic race. Since the Chinese have obtained possession of the country, the utmost vigilance has prevailed all along the line of the frontiers.

Some traders, however, natives of Hindustan, have been in the habit of frequenting Lassa, and one amongst them, who, if we are not mistaken, was also a political agent, has given a very full and excellent description of all he saw. The country, however, remains still, in many respects, a terra incognita, and we must look towards a less restricted intercourse, in order to ascertain its geography and know its people.

GILFILIAN v. GLOVER & CO.

As we go to press, we are placed in possession of a few notes on the case of Gilfilian v. Glover & Co., which would with more propriety find a place in the body of the report. The evidence on the part of the defendants taken before H. B. M.'s Consul at Nagasaki was put in as read, the Court having previously gone through the whole case. With regard to the private note written by Mr. T. B. Glover, it had been explained in the evidence before the Court that the 'positive offer' mentioned therein referred to the offer of $75,000, and not to that of $80,000.

It should also have been noted in the report, that during Mr. Eames's speech, when he asserted that if the defendants had kept the Chusan until June, 22nd, Mr. Gilfilian's letter would not have arrived too late, H. B. M. Consul remarked that it was clear from the evidence that Mr. Gilfilian's letter (L) of January 16th authorizing the detention of the Chusan, had not been received by Messrs. Glover & Co. until the steamer had left for Yokohama, Messrs. Glover & Co. in their letter (G) of January 22nd, saying

> We are just in possession of your favor of the 16th inst. ordering your limit for the Chusan to $75,000. This, however, we fear has come too late as the Chusan was despatched from this on the 19th inst.

After this explanation on the part of H. B. M. Consul, Mr. Eames apologised for the mistake, which had arisen in consequence of the shortness of the time in which he had been obliged to get up the case.

THE LATE NAVAL COURT.

To the Editor of the
NORTH-CHINA HERALD.

DEAR SIR,—In reply to that portion of a letter which appeared in the Recorder of the 7th inst., from Mr. C. Treasure Jones of H. B. M.'s Consulate, in which he states that "we never agreed to strike out any clause from our finding;" allow we to recall to Mr. Jones' recollection:—

1st,—That on the 25th July, I and my professional adviser on behalf of the Shanghai Steam Navigation Company, called on him at the Consulate, and pointed out the objections which we considered existed against the last paragraph of the finding of the Naval Court, and arranged that the finding should not be published on the following day in order to afford him time for deliberation.

2nd.—That on the 26th July in the afternoon, I and my professional adviser again called on him, and produced to him the Hongkong Gazette of the 12th March 1864, after reading which he distinctly stated that he thought the last paragraph had better be struck out, and gave us a letter to Lieutenant Watts the President, to that effect as he informed us, and requested us to see Lieut Watts on the subject, and it was agreed that unless he heard from Lieut. Watts to the contrary that the last paragraph should be struck out. I have of course no copy of this letter, but I presume Lieut. Watts has still the original. We accordingly did see Lieut. Watts and handed him Mr. Jones' letter, and moreover produced to him the Gazette previously referred to, and he in the presence of another member of the Court assented to the concluding paragraph of the finding being struck out.

3rd.—That on the 27th July, the Recorder published the finding alone of the Court without the objectionable concluding paragraph.

4th,—That during a subsequent interview in Mr. Jones' Office at the Consulate, Mr. Piper, the Master of the Argus and one of the members of the Naval Court, distinctly admitted that he had signed "both findings"!

I am dear Sir,
Your obedient servant,
NICHOL LATIMER,
Director Shanghai S. N. Co.

SHANGHAI, August 10*th* 1865.

To the Editor of the
NORTH-CHINA HERALD.*

SIR,—At the risk of tiring your patience and that of your readers I must, after the letter which has recently been addressed to you by Mr. Latimer, venture to trespass on your space.

The error which Mr. Latimer has committed is that of confounding unofficial expressions which may be used in conversation, with official acts done in due form and after due consideration. The Court originally arrived at the finding as it at present stands; when Mr. Latimer, with a not unnatural anxiety, hastened to point out a clause in the Hongkong Government Gazette, which he considered militated against that finding and, pending the interval necessary to ascertain whether the objection raised by Mr. Latimer (which was only taken into consideration at all in courtesy to him) was valid, the portion of the finding upon which there was no doubt was actually all that was arrived at, and as such was published, I believe, unofficially, by the local papers. After due consideration the Court decided to leave the finding as it originally stood, and as, through the correspondence which had already appeared, the public were likely to be in doubt upon the subject, the said finding was officially communicated to the Press in the letter which the North-China Daily News unaccountably failed to publish.

I have forwarded copies of this letter to your contemporaries.

I have the honor to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
C. TREASURE JONES.

* In answer to the foregoing.

THE MUNICIPAL DISCREPANCY.

To the Editor of the
NORTH-CHINA HERALD.

SIR,—In your daily issue of the 8th inst., you published a copy of a letter addressed by Mr. Alabaster to the Clerk of the Municipal Council, in which he defends Mr. Pickwoad from any suspicion which may attach to him, in respect of a discrepancy in the accounts of the Council, amounting to Tls. 1,000.

As the Treasurer of the Council for the year in question, I am glad to be able to support Mr. Alabaster's statement. So far as I can recollect, it was never supposed that Mr. Pickwoad had received the Tls. 1,000. The tale of Sankee was, I believe, to the effect that he paid this sum to me direct or through my Compradore; this, however, he failed to prove at the time. I do not think that Sankee ever hinted that the money had passed through Mr. Pickwoad's hands, and I certainly do not see how that gentleman can be held accountable.

I think this brief statement is due to Mr. Pickwoad. I trust it will be thought a sufficient apology for trespassing upon your space.

Your obedient servant,
J. PRIESTLEY TATE.
